I have no issues with recognising locals (never liked aboriginal, implies negativity: abnormal, abject, abstain) who were achievers, who stood for something worthwhile. I would prefer their name be given to a place or activity they were involved with. They had no written language, and each tribe had their own dialect, so arguing over spelling is a ridiculous waste of time. He was a warrior who defended his nation and people, so it would be more appropriate to name a military unit, piece of equipment or post after him, rather than an electoral function.
